I have created a custom smart contract using EthereumJ and deployed it on a test blockchain. The code for the contract is quite a bit bigger than the default EthereumJ hello world code. When I call the contract via a web3 contract address, however, it seems to execute the contract code before the parameters are supplied. Is there a way to tell what is going on? Is the code triggering some kind of default handler or is it just missing something? A: Note: These instructions are meant to help debug the launch of your contract, but this will not be sufficient for writing a production ready smart contract. For production-ready contracts, read up on the Truffle framework and Solidity documentation. This, for instance, has a great example of how to use the migration tool and how to interact with it via the Truffle dashboard. To debug your contract you will need to get some logging in your contract. You will want to implement a few methods to do this. The first method you
